

Lost in Translation:

What Do Duolingo Users Actually Want?

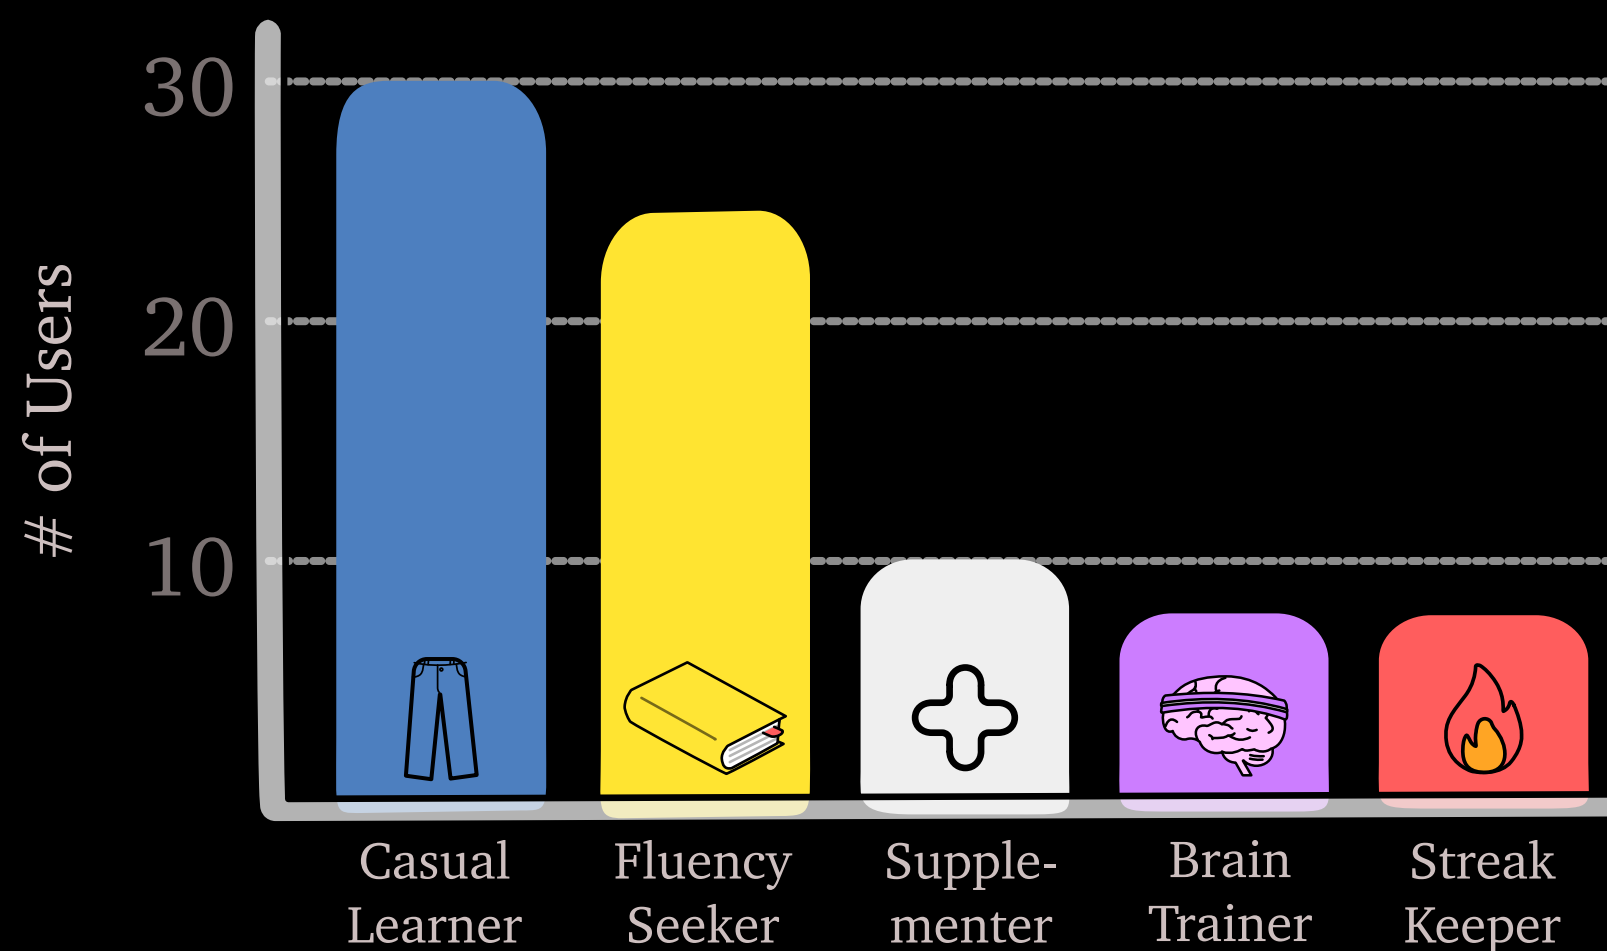

Data from 80 online reviews sourced from Reddit and Google Play reviews, divided into 5 distinct user categories.

What keeps some users coming back and what causes others to fly away?

Insight #1

Casual Learners and Fluency Seekers are the largest user subsets

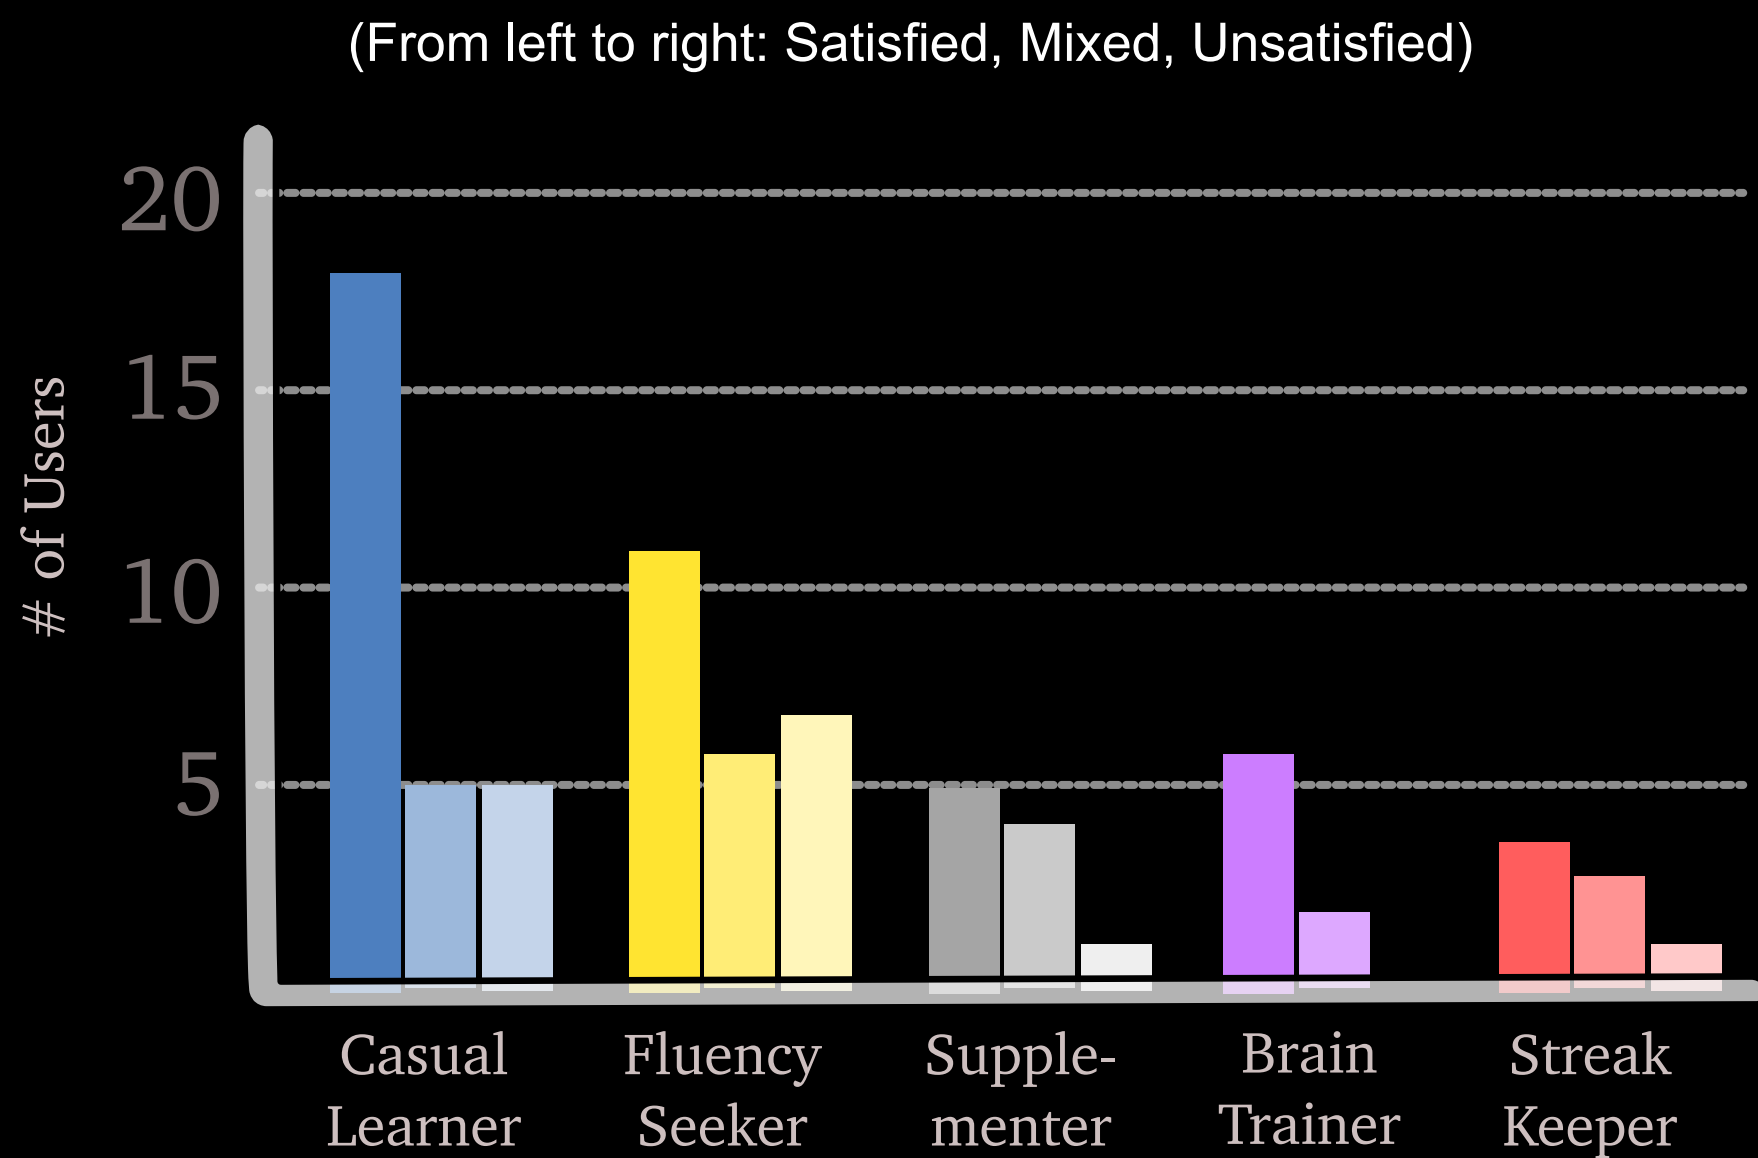

Sample Review Summaries

I use Duolingo daily to refresh my Spanish and French skills.

I moved to Germany and initially attempted to use Duolingo as my main language learning tool.

Insight #2

Fluency Seekers express the highest levels of dissatisfaction

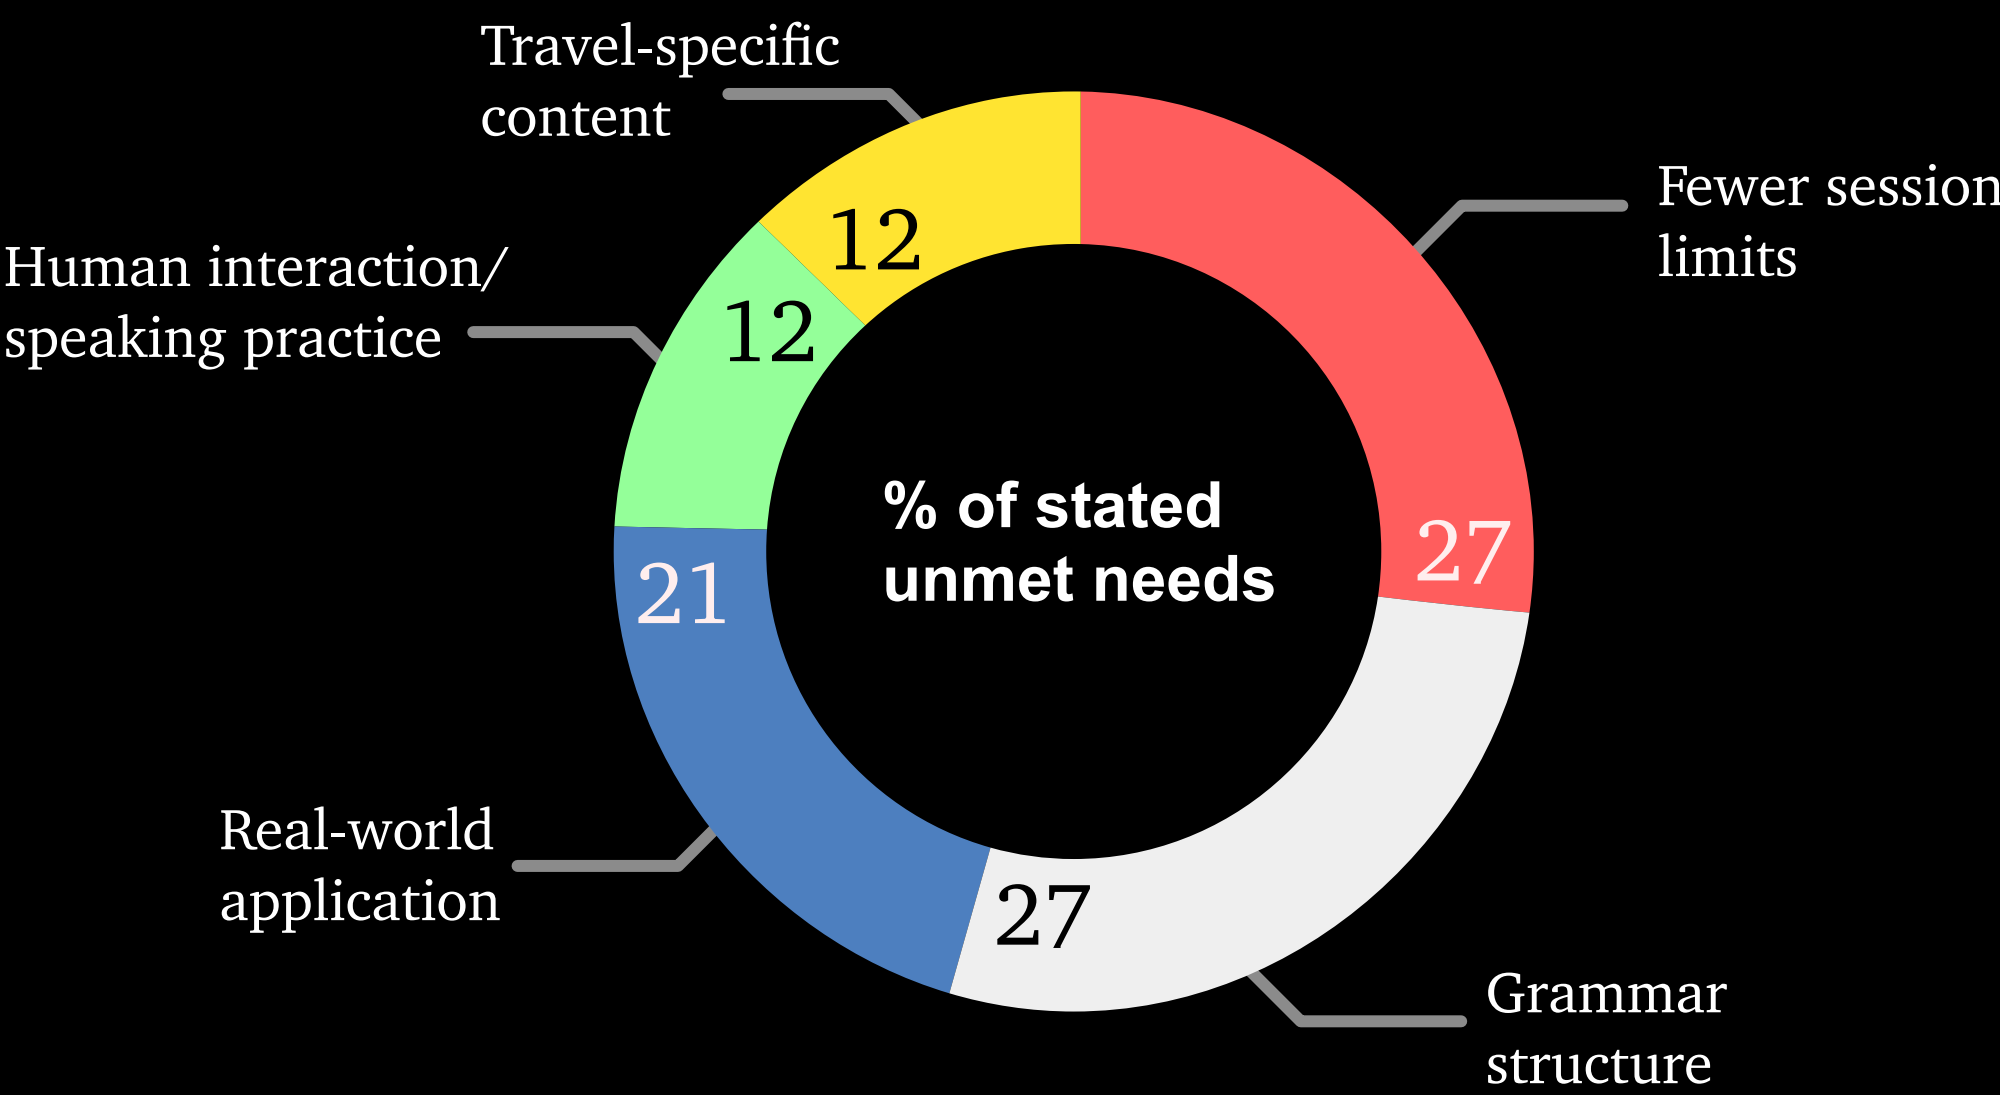

Sample Review Summaries

I can read well, but I still find speaking with natives is a challenge.

This app keeps you paying instead of really learning.

Insight #3

Grammar and fewer session limitations are the most-cited unmet needs

Sample Review Summaries

I needed more grammar so I wasn't just guessing about word order.

I don't like energy system — I get penalized even with right answers. The hearts were better.

Free use has become more limited. You really need a subscription to get more out of it.

*a majority of users in the dataset did not report an unmet need. This chart only reflects users who did express an unmet need.

Strategic Opportunities

Insights based off user sentiments

Leverage the Onboarding Surveys

Duolingo already has the data on why people downloaded the app. It can be utilized to meet users' needs and create higher subscription conversion and retention rates

Flashcards to Field Guide

Bridge real-world contexts and at-home learning. Reposition Duolingo as a central hub for translation services like a camera-based menu reader, live translation assist, or a digital travel handbook.

Individual Tracks

Duolingo could introduce different learning tracks based on user interest. E.g. grammar enthusiasts could use a dedicated grammar track.
